While a history of chronic diverticulosis is a risk factor for diverticulitis, only a minority of cases of diverticulitis have a previous history of diverticulitis. The presentation, diagnostic evaluation, and treatment of acute diverticulitis are similar to that of acute appendicitis, with emphasis placed on the need for an early surgical procedure. A diagnostic laparoscopy or laparotomy is performed to establish the diagnosis and remove nonperforated or perforated diverticula or to define abscess formation. The nonperforated or perforated diverticula are treated by resection, if feasible. The abscess may be treated by incision and drainage or may be left to drain spontaneously. The risk of recurrent diverticulitis must be considered and may be reduced with medical treatment, although recurrence may be as high as 25 percent.
